• When Lao Tzu speaks, the language may be different; Buddha talks, the language is different; Heraclitus talks, the language is different—but they mean the same, they indicate toward the same. They don't live in private worlds. The private world has disappeared with their dreams, desires—with the mind. Mind has a private world but consciousness has no private worlds. The walking have one world in common, All those who are walking, they have one world in common,—that is existence. And all those who are asleep or dreaming have their own worlds.

• When you encounter death, when you see it face-to-face, when you don't avoid, when you don't ~~try to~~ dodge, when you don't escape, when you don't create a cloud around you—when you face it, encounter it, the fear of death—suddenly you become aware that death is life. The deeper you move into death, the deeper you move in life because, Heraclitus says, the opposites meet and mingle; they are one.
